MAJOR RESEARCH UNDERTAKING

A Public Good Credit Research Initiative – transforming Big Data into Smart Data

I conceptualized in March 2009 this non-profit Credit Research Initiative (CRI), a large-scale research undertaking as a constructive response to the credit rating industry’s failure in the 2008-09 financial crisis. I have been leading the CRI team of around 35 staff since its inception to this date. The aim is to advance the science of default prediction by building up a world-class corporate default research infrastructure and at the same time provide timely, high-quality and aggregatable corporate default predictions, i.e., a kind of Smart Data, to the user community free of charge. In contrast to the for-profit credit rating agencies, the CRI treats credit ratings as a “public good”. The goal is to create a scientific competitor to commercial credit rating agencies, and to provide an alternative source and form of credit information via a not-for-profit channel. The CRI has been undertaken at the National University of Singapore’s Risk Management Institute as its flagship research program with the intent to spur research and development in the critical area of credit rating methodologies. Being non-profit, the initiative relies on voluntary contributions by credit research experts from around the world to help keep the default prediction model current and organically evolving so as to function like a "selective Wikipedia". The current CRI system produces daily updated default probabilities and actuarial spreads for prediction horizons up to 5 years on about 35,000 active, exchange-listed firms in over 110 economies around the world. The CRI database also includes historical time series of default probabilities, actuarial spreads and distances-to-default on these active companies and on about 30,000 delisted firms. In addition, RMI produces daily updated Corporate Vulnerability Index for economies, regions and portfolios of special interest. For further information, please visit <http://rmicri.org>.
